The connections are established via bluetooth. I have two devices. A main device and a target device. The main device is sending a long string containing the coordinates of a path to the target device. The target device will use these coordinates, and the main device will get some information from the target device. The target device will be opened later. I want to calculate the coordinates before it opens, so I will be able to send some information to the main device when it is opened. I can find coordinates from the target device, but I can't close the connection until I received enough information to calculate the coordinates. How can I fix this? Is there any solution? A: You can use TCP functions to send a message before opening the connection. You can use functions like: `sendto()` `send()` `sendto()` On the server side (main device) you should wait a confirmation from the target device that the connection was open. And you can use a function like: `recvfrom()` `recv()` `recvfrom()` On the client side (target device) you should wait until a message is received (you can use a simple while loop or an event listener). Also I recommend you to use an asynchronous event like file or socket events, to get the confirmation from the target device. Good luck! Pasodoble Pasodoble is the first album by Free Moral Agents. However, they were forced to resume touring when Phil's roommate, percussionist Kevin March, asked if they wanted to rehearse with him. That day was March 4, 2007. March's rhythm section,
