The study was conducted over a month after an event on March 31, 2013, in Turkey. A temporary regional reference network was established, consisting of a total of 12 permanent network stations. A total of 121 stations were installed on the network and 62,006 normal data points were obtained, including 3412 data points after the event. Temporally corrected normals and post-event data were generated, using a time-dependent model and a stochastic formulation based on the geophysical wave theory. The spatiotemporal patterns of these data, together with GPS measurements, were used as input to a model that comprises a spatial and temporal weighting for the vertical scalar parameter estimation. The proposed mapping method, Z-Map, combines the local 2D seismic e79caf774b

Looking for the English translation of his book? You are at the right place! The script looks like the following: i = 3 while True: id = input("i = ") i -= 1 print("You just have to press [enter] to exit.") You may get the following: i = 5 You just have to press [enter] to exit. i = 4 You just have to press [enter] to exit. i = 3 You just have to press [enter] to exit. i = 2 You just have to press [enter] to exit. i = 1 You just have to press [enter] to exit. You just have to press [enter] to exit. i = 0 You just have to press [enter] to exit. Thank you for using my script. A: Yes it happens because the program tries to look for the input before the while True loop is actually done with processing the first time. At that time the input is still "5" so it looks for it and you get the number as response. When the while loop is again not being processed it checks for the next input: input("You just have to press [enter] to exit.") which is "i = 2" and the program tries to subtract 2 from 3. Since there's no operation there, a random response is given: i = 1 The fix you should do, is to keep asking for the input until you get a valid number. In your code replace: while True: id = input("i = ") with while True: id = input("i = ") # if id is not integer: # break # here you check if you have got an integer - if not then you exit the while loop Although if I'm not wrong you need not do the while loop but still the input you are asking for: # in here you can ask for the user input without the while loop print("Please enter an integer") i = int(input())
