A: I can give you one of my favourite quotes from Pauline Baynes "How, if a dog barks at me, I shall know that he wants to bite me, and I shall take that as an omen of good or evil, depending on whether I am friendly to him or not." So if you are thinking "what's it got to do with my site" think again Someone has got a problem, they are telling you. The person sitting next to you in the train, is clearly trying to escape. If you are thinking this isn't useful to you, think again. If someone is forcing you to watch pornography, you should consider that a warning sign. If you can't tell whether a person is being friendly or not, then use this knowledge to your advantage. In other words, I think that if a website can inform its visitors that this site has a favour, or a dislike, from the author, it will want to maintain that balance. Obviously, I'm not saying that a dislike is better than a favour. All I am saying is that maybe some people can't tell the difference, and some people can't use that information if they get it. How will you tell the difference? Personally, I find that I can tell the difference between a like, or a dislike, pretty reliably. I'm sure the "people are forcing you to watch pornography" would make me very uncomfortable, regardless of whether c9d1549cdd

The reverse Hamlet sigil was my best kept secret. Perhaps it was to suggest 'Murder, Let's Save on New Haven' or 'Kill, Let's Save on Water'. If you needed a beer after a full day at the office, but felt like you didn't want to pay the price for it, purchasing one of these posters at the first distribution table on that particular night was a sure way to make it happen. One of the great things about waiting tables is the access to people's lives at personal scale. It's pretty obvious that a lot of people out there have a far worse week than my typical Sunday-Tuesday-Thursday-Friday seven day pattern. If I were to share every single adverse financial hardship from customers at my restaurant over the past twelve years, I'd probably put them in the category of 'Spineless Losers' with more problems than Osho's God complex. Sure, certain statistics can be extrapolated to a statistical probability. Sure, I get maybe ten to twenty people like me on a good week. But statistically speaking, I'm probably not unique. It just seems right, though. Such people would be the people that get to have a reverse Hamlet sigil backstage at a 'Murder, Let's Save on New Haven' live performance. The reverse Hamlet sigil. Wearing that sigil backstage is like putting the right-wing agenda of the manosphere into the aesthetic of a hardcore feminist performance troupe. Of course, being a hardcore feminist performance troupe doesn't necessarily have anything to do with being a feminist performance troupe, right? They have very strongly adopted anarchist methodologies, leaning heavily on the anarchist mutualism of autonomous action and grassroots praxis. Thanks to the Internet, it's easy to unearth the vast majority of words that have ever been placed online. Any group can make a list. A group can create a website. Maybe they could even be mildly effective. The reverse Hamlet sigil talks about murder and street history, but it's designed in a very attractive, even child-like way. Put another way, the designers spent a lot of time working with industrious five to seven year old children. If you see a graphic designer and a group of elementary school children that's a good
